

Examining medical minds

What your industry peers think about value-based health care

While political and economic environments may be changing, healthcare professionals agree that the journey to value-based health care will continue.

91%

of healthcare organizations have value-based-care initiatives under way.

Perception meets reality.

Transitioning to value-based care is a complex—and even risky—process that will take time.

Deep breath. This is only the beginning.

85%

of healthcare organizations reported that less than 25%

of their operations are designed to maximize value-based care.

Think healthier people and happier patients.

Patient care and results are powering value-based-care advances across the country.

It's the people who matter most.

63%

of healthcare professionals think improving the quality of care and patient outcomes are the most important principles of value-based care.

30%

of healthcare professionals believe creating a better patient experience is a top priority.

“If you put the patient at the center, you will... always come out ahead.”

—Survey respondent, CMO

The value-based mindset is here to stay.

So it's time to go to your happy place, accept that this may be uncomfortable, and know that 3M is here to help you get through it.

Better care for lower costs will continue to be top of mind.

65%

believe value-based care will continue to be a high priority.

82%

think that not even a repeal of the Affordable Care Act (ACA) would stop value-based-care initiatives.

See how we're changing the way you think about health care at 3M.com/healthdata.